

Poems Against War

A JOURNAL OF POETRY AND ACTION

12 Poems From the Journal: 2003-2008

12 POEMS

I Move Among the Dark Cubicles

Clean War

WMD

Baghdad Tattoo

You Have the Right to Make the World Beautiful!

While You're Shopping, Bombs
Are Dropping

Poem for the Living

The Old Warrior

A Dream of the Wind

Pretending to be Dead

What They Say

Thunder

CREDITS

Why Twelve Anti-War Poems?:

An Afterword

Biographies of Writers

I Move Among the Dark Cubicles
by Rosemary Klein

I move among the dark cubicles that barely divide person from person that barely shield soul and heart as an unfurled umbrella from the press of rain.

Power is nothing and everything to those without power, to those who waste in guilt and fear, who wander in routine.

Why would a man want to be ruled when everything on earth is capricious and free?

To such I say all that is forgotten is the same as all that is denied.

Those who gossip and drink at the water cooler, who imagine themselves going to battle with lesser than they,

those whose eyes drink too long on forms and applications, whose eyes rarely stray from the computer,

those with ear pressed to the cell phone or fingers pressed to the palm pilot, those who stay too long at meetings, workshops, conferences;

to them I say the soul agitates for renewal, for its place among all living creatures.

I do not judge one man above another. One man's shoulders are not higher than another man's measure.

Whether in lockstep or alone, I guarantee each a destiny.

Clean War
by Patricia Wellingham-Jones

They are calling this the cleanest war in all of military history.

--Tom Brokaw, April 2, 2003

Tell that to the ravens plucking out eyes
on the blood-packed sand

To fathers cradling
the last of their hopes in torn bodies

To young girls swelling with the unwanted gifts
of swift strong soldiers

To mothers and wives pulling on veils of grief
as they wash their dead

Inform the children who wander dazed with thirst, alone among ruins

WMD
by Auset

They made weapons of mass destruction and tucked their children in, careful kisses for tender dreams.

They made weapons of mass destruction
and went about the daily tumble of life, looking for love and ducking danger,
making rules for strangers.

They made weapons of mass destruction
and found enemies hidden in their fears, pretending that children were safe from evil living without borders.

When life is so big that it swallows us whole, the earth remains beneath our feet and there is no stranger that we meet whose step is unfamiliar.

We make weapons of mass destruction and cut up life into pieces that look foreign,
but at night
we tuck out children tight as though evil had a map.

Baghdad Tattoo
by Janet Parkinson

Baghdad's morgues are full. With no space to store bodies, some victims of the sectarian slaughter are not being kept for relatives to claim, but photographed, numbered, and quickly interred in government cemeteries. Men fearful of an anonymous burial are tattooing their thighs with names and phone numbers.

—Associated Press, November 13, 2006

Jalal Ahmed 07901 295135

Ali Abbas 07901 567256

Atheer Mohammad 07901 469798

are incised on my thigh.

My wife sees them when we make love.

I see them when I bathe, change clothes.

They are high enough to be covered at the beach. I do not want the world to know my fear.

I do not want the world to know

I have reason to fear.

There is thinking that neutrals are not attacked. But there are only two sides, and they change with each conversation.

My wife is afraid these men will die first,

and there will be no one to tell her about me. She wants her name, our phone number on my thigh.

But you are engraved on my heart, I tell her.

I will not have you exposed.

You Have the Right to Make the World Beautiful!

by Alan Barysh

You have the right to make the world beautiful!

It's your right by birth!

You have the right to make the world hospitable to all forms of life!

You have the right to be creative and build a planet that corresponds with your highest and boldest aspirations!

You have the right to make the world beautiful and the right to create this beauty by any means necessary!

While You're Shopping, Bombs Are Dropping
by Gregg Mosson

Saturday sun
details the faces of the marchers and the watchers.
We are shouting "no" to normalcy.

While I'm speaking,
bombs are nearing.

And meeting friends for dinner tonight,
I'll still have my life to solve:
Whom do I love, who loves me?

While we're breathing,
bombs are cleaving.

Solidarity with fathers, sisters, neighbors, strangers
is how I live,
is what I can give.

People Must Raise Their Voices to Inspire Change

Washington D.C., January 2007

Poems Against War: A Journal of Poetry and Action
www.poemsagainstar.com

III: March 20, 2003

When bombs dropped far away, rain came the next day to the U.S. Capital, a gray drain seeming to say the whole world would pay.

In a small room I woke beside my lover, but my bones
hijacked my mouth and said, "Mass Murder."

We refused to work that day Iraq was attacked.
We cooked, kept home.
Outside, justice crept into underground bulbs.

Birds on the street
argued with song
as if they didn't belong.

Human screams, attached to dust, began traversing the earth.

IV:

I vigil by the White House to answer with stillness,
"No Civilian Bombing" stenciled on a sign, squared in my lap . . .
until lullabies of evening strollers eddy past through the layered glow and breezy leaves of this ceremonial place. Nearing the placard passers' chittar-chatter collapses like bridges
imploded to air

as life drifts off
beyond the blackness
like cool winds touching down here, hinting of the cold singleness of stars and weaving off into the vast elsewhere. Night is more spacious than all our hearts;
in this space hearts can listen.
Human-perfected bombs
fall on praying families in my person.

Evening tunnels to a dark of plums.

V:

Norma O'Malley waddles to the door;
two o'clock light sleeps on Iowa June wheat.
She's sixty-two, a rooted widow, and her son Bill, whom she loves more than the sun, plans to greet more than the dawn, for whom she knits socks though he's forty-two—

Ms. O'Malley soon may shake like a tree branch torn by an overfull river and wedged taut across two rocks.
The news ricochets from field command to base, and then from desk to desk.
It nears her door. . . . It shatters now.

VI: Diana

"Dear diary, this dorm room is what I control: Four square walls with Sara-Beth, who comes and goes blithely, sequined and sequenced. But I can't rush out today, have skipped my classes—the whole reason I moved here to New York City. I need to be indoors, dressed in sweats, stripped of architectural prettiness, how my mother raised me, and write of what I've only heard. But how?
I'll meditate upon a star, a zone where anyone can hide.
Stars soon to come out, do they tinsel a bombed-out building in Fallujah? Is it night there now and do I rotate under the same light to where a chair
blasted into the street invites me to sit?

Did they live there, like me—in some Apartment 4B—smally?"

VII: Cape Cod

Flags flap from houses.
Tuesday's concert includes a patriotic song.
The gray newspaper armors its tones.
August rolls on.

Ocean rumbles through slicing mist.
Faintest clouds touch green dunes.
Birds chime from slightly tossed pines.
This is my home.

Opinions are honed like thin knives.
Puddles of silence coalesce in gutters;
on clear days they catch the sun's multicolors.
Watch the changes.

VIII:

Blood, seep into the fruit tree alone in the desert of neon, desert of sirocco wind, desert of televisions, desert of farmers' almanacs, fallow of public speaking, reservoir of private censure,
and circulate the harvest, share this strange fruit.

A few have joined us, pass around the circle.
Wind, whirl incense of this wild wholeness over oceans, needle through blocked mountains, rush silent deserts, infuse tents and houses,
and widen the circle, coax more to sit among us to share the suffusion, sumptuous with nutrients:
this vision of the fruit tree, fruit tree's vision, vision of the apple seed, the whole apple.

Washington D.C January 2007

New York City, March 2004

The Old Warrior
by Marcus Colasurdo

for Philip Berrigan

When he emerged from captivity
the people crowded around him.

They flung their questions like spears over heads of wheat.

The old warrior listened,
the lines of his face in raw books of history.

On the gray steps,
the voices grew louder:
they wanted to know what the battle was like how many were killed
how the blood tasted.

The old warrior stood unmoving;
not even whispering
though something tectonic jumped in his eyes.

He may have offered a flower
but I didn't see it.

He may have folded his arms in prayer
but I couldn't tell.

From his tongue
only the ocean rose

And when the questions brought down
Thunder,
he smiled at a child
and climbed the grey stairs again.

A Dream of the Wind
by Marcus Colasurdo

When the red dawn finally explodes upon our land and the earth covering the hundred million trembles-

A new people will appear wearing symbols on their cloaks.

They will speak a language from the lips of the caves of copper
and they will carry their shelter on their backs.

They will travel by foot and worship
the horses that still run free.

At night
 they will gather near fires
 preparing the food;
etching blankets and belts
 from what is left.

The women will measure great distances by charting the cross-eyed stars:
for these will be a people who have known imperfection.

The men will stretch tents into drums,
 thinking of new melodies:
for these will be a people who have known great silence.

The children will pantomime
 the sway of the trees:

for these will be a people
of whom nothing is known.

Pretending to be Dead

by Antler

How many boys who loved playing army,
Who loved pretending to be shot tumbling down summer hills,
Who loved pretending to be dead as their bestfriend checked to make sure,
Or who loved pretending to deliver their last-words soliloquy wincing in imagined pain or lost and dreamy,
Find themselves years later trapped on the battlefield
Hearing the voices of enemy soldiers Searching for corpses to mutilate or wounded to torture to death?

What man remembers those idyllic boyhood days then
As he lies still as possible
Trying not even to breathe, hoping beyond hope
 the enemy will pass him by,
Knowing if he's discovered they'll cut off his cock and balls and stuff them in his screaming mouth
And then, before cutting off his head, disembowl him before his eyes?

Ah, thousands of boys and men have met this end,
Millions perhaps by now,
 so many people
 so many wars.

Do they go to a special heaven set aside for all who die like this?
Restored to the bodies they had,
The memory erased of that insane end to the story of their lives?

Do they still get a chance to play army with joy
And pretend to be shot
 and pretend to die?

After they meet this end?
Do they still get to thrill in pretending to be dead
 after they die?
After this hideous inhuman end will they laugh and wrestle their bestfriend again?

Pretending to be Dead by Antler, p. 2

What They Say
by Barbara Simon

So much to be thankful for in America--Good folks folded like handkerchiefs into the pocket of our national pride. How well our great country churns through the vast swell of world opinion. Dominance swells our chest. So responsible, we are for helping the little guy. Beleaguered countries beg us to help their folk learn how to grow a real nation, one where the chief executive would never lie. Chief among the virtues of this swell American ideal, we know we are a moral nation, filled with people thankful for liberty, freedom—democratic folk willing to stand up for this great country.

To honor our country, we let slide pomposity, pretension, and chief among our cardinal sins, the folk wisdom that we are right: the swell of public debate always for flag waving. Our national patriotism, the refuge of a nation that smiles after bombing a country into submission for weapons it didn't have, chiefly to get the oil, the swell reserves to feed the fine folk at Halliburton or Bechtel, corporate folk whose only interest is our national debt they allow to grow to swell their coffers, raping us, the country going down as our chief executive cowboy struts for an image of victory, our country welcome only to the Fortune 500 folk, their chief goal to make the nation safe, or so they say.

Thunder
by Auset

In trying times to walk
On the heels of the ancestors
Quietly
Always giving thanks
Giving thanks always

Tread lightly
They will hear your step

Do not awaken the thunder
Sleeping in their hearts

It will rain soon enough

Why Twelve Anti-War Poems?
An Afterword by Gregg Mosson
09/04/08

The poems here are culled from the first seven issues of Poems Against War, a journal that began publishing in May 2003 in a limited edition at first biannually and then annually. The small-press journal is archived at the University of Wisconsin, Madison library—special collections department. In 2007, Poems Against War Vol. 6: Music & Heroes become available internationally through Wasteland Press, followed by Poems Against War Vol. 7: Ars Poetica. The magazine won a Puffin Foundation Grant in 2008.

Poems Against War says artists must raise their voices to inspire change. In mainstream American literary magazines still, scant literature dares to speak about war and other pressing social issues facing people in the 21st century. In this way, publications create a fiction that most people can live their personal lives outside of cultural, social and political changes. In addition, such silence endorses the status quo. Yet if the status quo is not tending toward peace and justice, it is not good enough.

In February 2003, U.S. First Lady Laura Bush invited a number of writers to a White House conference on the topic of Emily Dickinson, Walt Whitman, and Langston Hughes. Neither Hughes nor Whitman would have come to that symposium on the eve of a war and remained silent. When it became rumored that invited West Coast poet Sam Hamill might mention his opposition to the then-brewing 2003 Iraq invasion, Mrs. Bush cancelled the symposium. The U.S. went to war with Iraq on March 19, 2003.

Hamill gave birth to a ‘Poets Against the War’ movement. He created a Web site allowing over 11,000 poets in a matter of months to contribute their poems from the U.S. and around the world. This movement exposed a swell of U.S. sentiment against the war. This journal takes its cue from Hamill and Langston Hughes and Walt Whitman—and especially from Whitman’s “Song of Myself”—in providing space for voices of witness, peace, anger, vision, and joy.

BIOGRAPHIES

Antler is author of Selected Poems (Soft Skull Press, 2000) and Last Words (Ballantine Books, 1986). He has been the poet laureate of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and writes poetry of vision. His long poem “Factory” is a must read. The poem here “Pretending to be Dead” can be found in his Selected Poems.

Auset is a name derived from an ancient Egyptian god, and is the stage name for an African-American woman who lives in Baltimore, Maryland. This poem comes from her chapbook, Thunder. Auset and poet Marcus Colasurdo perform a traveling poetic 2-person show, Thunder and Lightning.

Alan Barysh is a Baltimore poet, activist, and jazz enthusiast, whose dedication and work dates back to the 1960s. His work can be found in the anthology Octopus Dreams (Abecedarian Books, 2006), and on the CDs Art Between Deliveries (ABCD, 2007) and Alan Barysh with the Buzzard Luck Ensemble (ABCD, 1995—ABCD; PO Box 33127; Baltimore Maryland 21218).

Marcus Colasurdo is a poet and teacher whose performance company Gimmie Shelter Productions in Maryland has put on fundraising benefits using poetry for 15 years. He has inked Bending Zen Wavelengths, a book of poems, and Angel City Taxi, an unpublished novel based on his days as Los Angeles taxi cab driver.

Rosemary Klein is executive director of the Maryland State Poetry & Literary Society, and founding editor and director of Three Conditions Press. Her poems have appeared widely.

Gregg Mosson is the publisher and main editor of Poems Against War: A Journal of Poetry and Action. He has written a book of nature poetry, Season of Flowers and Dust (Goose River Press). His reporting, reviews, and poetry have appeared in The Cincinnati Review, The Baltimore Sun, Poet's Ink, and other places. If you dare, seek more at www.greggmoss.com

Janet Parkinson is a poet, editor and writer in Rhode Island. Her work has appeared in Sow's Ear Poetry Review, Arsenic Lobster, and Abys & Apex.

Barbara Simon's first full-length book of poetry is The Woman From Away (Three Conditions Press). She taught at the University of Maryland--Baltimore County. She died from cancer in 2007 and shall be missed.

Patricia Wellingham-Jones has written Voices on the Land (Rattlesnake Press) and Don't Turn Away: Poems About Breast Cancer (PWJ Publishing). Her work has appeared widely. She is a former psychology researcher, and her Web site is www.wellinghamjones.com.

- All rights to these poems are held by the poets.
- Feel free to reprint or distribute for educational and non-profit purposes. For other reasons, query.
- This anthology was produced by Poems Against War: A Journal of Poetry and Action
- www.poemsagainstawar.com / pawmagazine@yahoo.com